Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues

Seventh session

New York, 21 April-2 May 2008

Item 7 of the provisional agenda*

Half-day discussion on indigenous languages

Report of the international expert group meeting on indigenous languages

Summary

The present report provides an overview of the issues discussed at the international expert group meeting on indigenous languages, held from 8 to 10 January 2008, at United Nations Headquarters in New York. Some of the issues discussed included the importance of linguistic diversity, the connection between language rights and all other fundamental rights, a concern for the lack of urgency while the majority of all indigenous languages are threatened with extinction, and proposals for the revitalization, promotion and protection of indigenous languages.

I. Introduction

1. The year 2008 has been proclaimed by the General Assembly as the International Year of Languages. Responding to the need for concrete public policies for the protection and promotion of indigenous languages, the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues, at its sixth session, recommended that the Economic and Social Council authorize the convening of an international expert group meeting on indigenous languages. At its regular session in July 2007, the Council approved the Forum's recommendation in decision 2007/244 to hold the meeting, which was organized by the secretariat of the Permanent Forum.

II. Organization of work

A. Attendance

2. The following members of the Permanent Forum attended the workshop: Carlos Mamani Condori, Hassan Id Balkassm, Paimaneh Hasteh, Tonya Gonella Frichner and Victoria Tauli-Corpuz.

3. The following invited experts from the seven indigenous sociocultural regions participated in the workshop: Lydia Nyati Ramohobo (Africa); Carl Christian Olsen (Arctic); Anne Lasimbang (Asia); Luis Montaluisa Chasiquiza (Central and South America and the Caribbean); Fenya Likhanova (Eastern Europe, Russian Federation, Central Asia and Transcaucasia); Priscilla Settee (North America); and Jeanie Bell (Pacific).

4. The workshop was attended by observers from departments, agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, observers from other intergovernmental organizations, non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and Member States. The list of participants is contained in annex II.

B. Documentation

5. The participants had before them a draft agenda and programme of work, a background paper and documents prepared by participating experts. In addition, a number of documents were submitted to the meeting by observers. The documentation is available on the website of the secretariat of the Permanent Forum at http://www.un.org/esa/socdev/unpfii/en/EGM_IL.html.

C. Opening of the meeting

6. At the opening of the meeting, the Director of the Division for Social Policy and Development made an opening statement on behalf of the Under-Secretary-General for Economic and Social Affairs.

D. Election of officers

7. Ms. Tauli-Corpuz was elected Chairperson of the workshop and Ms. Gonella Frichner was elected Co-chairperson of the workshop. Ms. Andriamiesza of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) was elected Rapporteur.

E. Adoption of the conclusions and recommendations

8. On 10 January 2008, the workshop adopted, by consensus, the conclusions and recommendations contained in section III below. The workshop decided to annex to the present report a poem written in the Evenk language and translated into Russian (see annex V).

F. Closure of the workshop

9. The meeting was closed after the conclusions and recommendations were adopted in the final meeting, held on 10 January 2008.

III. Conclusions and recommendations

A. Overview

10. The meeting took note of the richness of the written contributions of the meeting, as well as the oral interventions that were delivered and the many examples of good practices that were presented.

11. Indigenous peoples and their languages are threatened around the world. The loss of indigenous languages signifies not only the loss of traditional knowledge but also the loss of cultural diversity and spirituality. Dire as this situation is, there is a lack of awareness on the part of some Governments, indigenous peoples and the intergovernmental system of the urgency for policy measures to reverse this trend.

12. Nevertheless, the international community has prepared a solid international legal normative framework that is relevant for the protection of indigenous languages, of which the most recent one is the newly adopted United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. A list of these instruments is available in annex IV.

13. Indigenous languages are treasures of vast traditional knowledge concerning ecological systems and processes and how to protect and use some of the most vulnerable and biologically diverse ecosystems in the world. It is no coincidence that the areas where indigenous peoples live are the areas that contain the greatest biological diversity. In fact, biological, linguistic and cultural diversity are inseparable and mutually reinforcing, so when an indigenous language is lost, so too is the traditional knowledge for how to maintain aspects of the world's biological diversity. The protection of indigenous languages is therefore not only a cultural and moral imperative, but an important aspect of global efforts to address biodiversity loss, climate change and other environmental challenges.

14. Language rights must be implemented as a collective and an individual right. It is crucial to recognize that indigenous peoples' language rights include, but are not limited to:

- (a) The right to maintain and to use their own language;

- (b) The right to have indigenous languages recognized in constitutions and laws;
- (c) The right to maintain personal names, place names and the proper names of their languages;
- (d) The right to be educated in the mother tongue (either in State schools or in their own schools);
- (e) The right to use indigenous languages in court and administrative proceedings;
- (f) The right to non-discrimination on the grounds of language in such domains as work, social security, health, family life, education, cultural life and freedom of speech;
- (g) The right to take part in public affairs and public service without discrimination on the grounds of language;
- (h) The right to establish indigenous media in indigenous languages as well as to have access to mainstream media in indigenous languages.

B. Examples of good practices

15. The meeting was presented with a number of examples of good practices ranging from university programmes to children's centres to political movements. As diverse as these examples were, they all illustrated the importance of indigenous peoples' agency, while also emphasizing the crucial role that the State and other parties play. For example, efforts to promote newspapers, community radio, song, dance and poetry and other literature in indigenous languages are beneficial. It is also seen as a positive step when institutions of higher education use indigenous languages, while translations of literary works into indigenous languages serve to strengthen the language.

16. Initiatives that have proved beneficial to the strengthening of indigenous languages are government-appointed language committees, such as in Greenland. Those committees can develop normative or standardized usage of the language in the contexts of education, communication and legislation.

17. Other positive initiatives involve translation of relevant laws and important political texts into indigenous languages so that indigenous peoples can better participate in the political sphere. It is important to translate legal texts into indigenous languages and use them in legal proceedings. There are also positive examples of school boards, health care systems, and corporations that have developed a process of involving indigenous language in the legislative procedures.

18. It is essential to include indigenous languages and cultures into early childhood care and education curriculum, and promote multilingualism, as is the case in Sabah, Borneo, Malaysia. The early childhood centres described at the meeting prepare children to enter government primary schools and also strengthen their foundation to understand their own languages and practice their own cultures.

19. An example from Australia emphasized the importance of indigenous teachers' developing their own language programmes, their own educational material and the use of indigenous languages in the media and in publications.

20. The creation of schools in the Russian Federation for children whose parents lead nomadic lives is another example of attempts to meet the educational needs of indigenous children, as are some bilingual education programmes in North Siberia and the Far East of the Russian Federation.

21. Language movements have been successful when the promotion of linguistic diversity has been promoted as a national responsibility, such as with the movement for the Amazigh language in Morocco.

22. The struggle of indigenous peoples in Ecuador has led to the State recognition of indigenous education systems through the establishment of the National Department of Intercultural and Bilingual Education,¹ which is managed by indigenous peoples, while in Bolivia, the Programa de Formación en Educación Intercultural Bilingüe para los Países Andinos,² a cooperation between the San Simón University in Cochabamba, Bolivia, and a bilateral organization has awarded Masters degrees in linguistic, cultural and bilingual education to over 100 indigenous students from six Andean countries.

23. Language immersion for children and adults of the Mohawk Nation at Kahnawake in North America has produced positive results for language revival, where activities include the training of trainers, language lessons through television, television series for children and commandeering popular media and modernization.³ In addition to the full immersion programmes, other positive examples include the Onondaga Nation and Tuscarora Nation, which also teach their languages in their Nation schools.

24. A successful initiative in Canada has been the Northern Aboriginal Broadcasting Programme, which has provided funding to organizations such as the Inuit Broadcasting Corporation for close to 25 years to support the production of television and radio programming for broadcast in aboriginal languages.

25. The Inter-American Development Bank has a databank on indigenous legislation in Latin America.⁴ One of the indicators is the extent to which language rights are recognized.

26. The meeting welcomed the examples of work of United Nations agencies, indigenous peoples' organizations and NGOs that have translated the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples and other relevant United Nations documents.

C. Challenges, gaps and concerns

27. Language rights, as part of cultural rights, are inadequately recognized in many countries. They have been neglected in national legislation and policy and are often excluded from the realm of human rights and human rights implementation processes. Language rights, as part of cultural rights, are also integral elements of the right to self-determination and should be viewed within the context of the universal, interdependent and complementary nature of human rights.

28. The importance of languages cannot be undervalued, as they reflect the world views of indigenous communities. For example, customary laws of indigenous communities are often in their languages, and if the language is lost the community may not fully understand its laws and system of governance. Loss of language also undermines the identity and spirituality of the community and the individual. The meeting emphasized the importance of looking at language rights from a holistic perspective, and that language rights cannot be fully enjoyed in the absence of other basic human rights, health, decent work or self-determination.

29. In many countries, discriminatory language policies from the colonial era continued after independence, favouring languages that the majority of citizens do not speak as the first language in their homes. Policies, legislation and their implementation often discriminate against indigenous languages in a number of ways, including attaching special privileges in terms of participation in governance, territorial privileges or representation in the media, to speakers of certain non-indigenous languages. The prevailing situation in the world today is that certain languages are given official status and recognition while the majority of languages, and, in particular, indigenous languages, are denied legal recognition. This deplorable imbalance weakens indigenous languages and contributes to views that portray indigenous languages as inferior and give room for discriminatory and corrupt practices that are difficult to combat through legal or political means.

30. An overwhelming majority of all countries have more than one language spoken within their borders, and governments frequently cite a lack of resources as a major obstacle in protecting indigenous languages. Although this is sometimes a valid concern, it is important to view indigenous languages not as a financial drain but as a valuable resource, that language diversity is a major contribution to the wealth of the country's cultural heritage and therefore there is a need for more political will to provide the resources needed to preserve and develop this heritage. It should also be stressed that the promotion of indigenous languages does not undermine national unity; on the contrary it is a positive contribution to national heritage. Furthermore, indigenous languages often do not coincide with national borders and they should therefore be dealt with at the national level and in the context of cross-border cooperation.

31. Although language loss has happened in the past, humanity is today facing an unprecedented threat to linguistic diversity and this threat is most acutely felt by indigenous peoples. Although language loss is attributed to globalization and migration, it is also a result of systemic and deliberate efforts to destroy languages using racist and discriminatory policies and laws.

32. Past and current experiences have shown, for example, that whole generations of indigenous children who were placed in boarding schools away from their communities lost their language. A number of experimental programmes are attempting to create culturally appropriate and bilingual schools that may reverse this trend.

33. Some States seek the revitalization, preservation and promotion of indigenous languages, but language programmes are frequently underfunded, while smaller language communities struggle to receive any funding at all. Where some funding becomes available, the sustainability of such programmes becomes a challenge.

34. The meeting was concerned with the fact that a lack of funding (especially predictable funding) and political will to promote and protect indigenous languages remains a major challenge.

35. It is another challenge to produce a curriculum for indigenous children that is relevant to them and their communities, while also following national curriculums prescribed by the government. Funding, teacher training and support are needed to develop these programmes that respect and promote indigenous cultures and languages, while also providing indigenous children with the capacities to become productive members of national societies.

36. Although indigenous languages have a great deal in common and share many of the same challenges, there are some differences, especially based on the number of speakers and the different national contexts in which indigenous peoples live. For example, the challenges that indigenous language speakers are faced with in the developed world tend to be related to revitalization and attempts to repair the damage that has been done to indigenous languages over generations of culturally detrimental policies, while in the developing world, there is a greater focus on maintenance and strengthening of indigenous languages. Although there are exceptions to this generalization, the meeting was concerned at the high proportion of indigenous languages in developed countries that are endangered.

37. Finally, the meeting was concerned about the objectives of some programmes for endangered languages that may not coincide with those of indigenous peoples. Recording a language as an archival artefact is a preservation attempt that, although worthy in its own right, often does not adequately meet the community objectives of language revitalization and increasing the number of fluent speakers.

D. Recommendations

38. The agenda of the meeting was divided into five different themes (see annex I). However, owing to the fact that those issues are cross-cutting and the recommendations are not easily categorized under one theme or another, the recommendations will be categorized according to the main addressee. It should be noted that a great many of the recommendations can and should be implemented through the cooperation of various interested actors, and not only the main addressee.

Recommendations to States

39. The promotion and protection of indigenous peoples' language rights and associated rights are a part of cultural democracy. Those rights should form an integral part of development policies across various sectors, such as health, education and agriculture.

40. States should:

(a) Take necessary measures to implement relevant recommendations of human rights treaty bodies and special rapporteurs regarding the recognition, protection, promotion and revitalization of indigenous languages;

(b) Use the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples and other relevant human rights standards as the basis to develop policies and laws related to the promotion and strengthening of indigenous languages;

(c) Take adequate constitutional and other legislative measures for the recognition of indigenous languages and develop policies and programmes that strengthen the daily use of indigenous languages at all levels, in public and private institutions, within and outside indigenous communities;

(d) Ensure adequate funding for the preservation, revitalization and promotion of indigenous languages and cultures, recognizing the cost of implementing programmes and projects in remote areas;

(e) Raise the prestige of indigenous languages by supporting efforts towards standardization, by establishing indigenous universities and by promoting the use of indigenous languages in public administration;

(f) Ensure that language is included as one of the indicators to identify indigenous persons, with consideration of the census as an informative tool that gives relevant information regarding indigenous peoples. Although the language or mother tongue variable is important in national censuses to help disaggregate data on indigenous peoples, it is not sufficient to identify ethnicity. Indigenous experts should participate in identifying those variables, and in all other aspects of the censuses, including their formulation, training of census takers, registration, analysis and dissemination. At the same time, it must be recognized also that some indigenous peoples are wary of responding to censuses;

(g) Adopt legislation acknowledging that the traditional knowledge of indigenous peoples is their inalienable cultural heritage and embodies their cultural identity and make such legislation and information available in local indigenous languages;

(h) Develop quality indigenous education policies, guaranteeing the right to mother tongue education, with the participation of indigenous peoples in all levels of planning and implementation, respecting the principle of free, prior and informed consent;

(i) Support the creation of indigenous universities, language departments in universities and other degree programmes to promote indigenous languages as a vehicle and expression of intangible culture, traditions and expressions;

(j) Protect and promote indigenous languages by supporting indigenous use of current and emerging multimedia technology, establishing quota systems or similar mechanisms that ensure adequate representation of indigenous languages in public- and private-owned media by providing funding for the publication of indigenous literature, and by promoting the use of indigenous symbols and signs in the public sphere;

(k) Guarantee the right to mother tongue education for indigenous children, regardless of the number of its speakers and ensure the teaching of those languages to indigenous children who do not know them;

(l) Respect the wishes of indigenous peoples living in voluntary isolation to continue living in that way and adopt concrete measures to respect the language rights of those peoples when they are exposed to outside contact;

(m) Ensure the participation of indigenous peoples not only in the decisions related to the status of indigenous languages in the whole society but also in the decisions related to the linguistic corpus (alphabet, orthographic norms, technical terminology, etc.);

(n) Ensure that an enabling linguistic environment exists in which speakers of indigenous languages are not forced or coerced to give up their languages in order to succeed in national life.

Recommendations to the United Nations system and other intergovernmental organizations

41. Given the importance of human rights treaty bodies and relevant special rapporteurs in monitoring the implementation of language rights of indigenous peoples, indigenous peoples should continue using those mechanisms to advocate that Governments fulfil all their obligations, including their treaty obligations.

42. The United Nations system and other international organizations are called upon to take the following actions:

(a) The international community should begin drafting a convention to protect indigenous languages, identities, and rights and establishing international instruments to collect information and pursue violations related to language, cultural and indigenous rights, both in the public and private sectors, such as establishing an authority on language rights and a rapporteur, commissioner or agency on language discrimination;

(b) The international community should promote measures to create accountability for the deliberate destruction of indigenous languages. The new expert mechanism on the rights of indigenous peoples of the Human Rights Council should conduct a study exploring the deliberate destruction of indigenous languages as a gross human rights violation;

(c) UNESCO, with the cooperation of Governments, should establish possibilities for the more effective engagement of indigenous peoples' organizations in standard setting activities and programmes of policy development and implementation of the legal instruments of UNESCO. The organization should also provide funding support for those issues;

(d) UNESCO should disseminate more widely among indigenous peoples information on its various standard setting instruments related to language, cultural diversity and cultural heritage and enhance the capacities of indigenous peoples to use them;

(e) The meeting noted that filtering language promotion to the community level can be an issue, especially when government frameworks are not in place. The language standards and policies of UNESCO may be difficult to implement at the local level since the organization works through the government level first. Therefore, it is recommended that UNESCO strengthen its working relationship with NGOs and civil society organizations so that language policies are implemented directly at the level of indigenous communities and seek government support where possible;

(f) UNESCO should, in collaboration with States and indigenous experts, work towards the development of a comprehensive set of standards on indigenous languages and identity data, variables and indicators, including census, that will help identify and address the state, trends and strategies in the maintenance, revitalization and protection of indigenous languages;

(g) UNESCO and the secretariat of the Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues should cooperate in producing a brochure or pamphlet aimed at Governments on the importance of supporting/protecting indigenous languages;

(h) The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) should continue to safeguard and make use of indigenous languages as well as to acknowledge the valuable insights they provide for an understanding of rural livelihoods, biodiversity, sustainable use of natural resources and many other issues related to food security and rural development;

(i) FAO should also continue to support indigenous and rural communities in partnership and cooperation with indigenous peoples' organizations and United Nations agencies in the use of their mother tongues and in the efforts to make their means of communication more effective;

(j) United Nations agencies and other international organizations should translate programme and project documents and publications that are relevant to indigenous peoples into indigenous languages. The translations should be made accessible and be downloadable free of charge online;

(k) The biggest challenge is among those indigenous peoples who live in urban areas where they do not use the language as much for various reasons. In this regard, special attention should be given to their situation. The Permanent Forum and the Inter-Agency Support Group on Indigenous Issues should focus on ways to protect language during situations of migration by indigenous peoples, paying close attention to the role of women as transmitters of language to their children;

(l) The international community should fund programmes that allow for an exchange of language programme ideas across indigenous communities.

Recommendations to indigenous peoples

43. Indigenous peoples should:

(a) Make efforts to stabilize their languages and keep them alive;

(b) Recognize, bearing in mind the important role of men, that indigenous women are often the primary transmitters of indigenous languages to future generations and should empower them for a greater participation in decision-making and language revitalization;

(c) Endeavour to familiarize themselves with existing legal instruments, in particular the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples and treaty bodies of the United Nations and other United Nations agencies such as UNESCO, and equip themselves to use them to protect and promote their language and cultural rights;

(d) Cooperate with other indigenous peoples on language matters, exchanging experiences and good examples;

(e) Promote awareness among speakers of indigenous languages of the impending loss and inherent value of their languages in the face of assimilation policies and educational institutions which have imposed hegemonic ideologies that devalue indigenous languages.

Other recommendations

44. The following actions are recommended:

(a) States, indigenous peoples and international organizations should collaborate in translating the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples into indigenous languages and disseminate these widely;

(b) Funding agencies and donors should support revitalization programmes that endeavour to produce new speakers — not just documenting or archiving — for the most critically endangered languages, whose most urgent need is the immediate development of new fluent speakers to carry forward the words and knowledge of the ageing elders;

(c) States, United Nations agencies, donors, research institutions, religious organizations, the media and NGOs should ensure the proper and correct identification of the names of indigenous languages;

(d) Increasing the number of fluent speakers should be the main objective of these language revitalization efforts, while indigenous languages that are not necessarily under immediate threat of extinction face different challenges, such as promotion and to be used in full equality with other national official languages. Moreover, efforts of individual experts to salvage and promote indigenous languages will not be effective unless the concerned community desires such efforts and takes action in that direction. Indigenous peoples themselves must claim ownership of their languages and direct revitalization efforts of their languages.

Preliminary ideas regarding a world conference on linguistic diversity, indigenous languages, identity and education

45. The meeting agreed that conditions are right for a world conference on linguistic diversity, indigenous languages, identity and education. United Nations Member States have recognized the importance of linguistic diversity by proclaiming 2008 as the International Year of Languages, the United Nations Declaration on Indigenous Peoples was recently adopted, and UNESCO has carried out a preliminary study on the technical and judicial aspects of a possible international normative instrument for the protection of indigenous and endangered languages.

46. Although conditions for such a world conference are relatively positive, a number of issues need to be resolved. It is essential that this world conference include the widest possible participation of indigenous representatives, and that they be actively involved in all aspects of the conference, from its preparations, right through the drafting of its documents and implementing its outcomes. It is equally important that this world conference be a United Nations world conference, ensuring the active participation and commitment of Member States, thus increasing its impact on indigenous languages.

47. The conference might be organized through the close cooperation of the Permanent Forum and UNESCO and other relevant United Nations agencies. Its preparation would require regional preparatory meetings of experts and the active use of other international conferences for awareness-raising and input into the conference.

48. Finally, for this world conference to become a reality, it is essential to ensure the political and financial commitment of a Member State or States to champion the idea of the conference, while funding may include inter-agency efforts, in addition to voluntary funding from States, indigenous peoples' organizations, foundations and others.

49. The agenda of the conference could include the following subjects: constitutional and other juridical protection of indigenous languages; democratic policies in the promotion of indigenous languages; actions by indigenous peoples for the protection and promotion of indigenous languages; and promotion of indigenous languages in the media.

My Language

If I forget my native speech,
And the songs that my people sing
What use are my eyes and ears
What use is my mouth

If I forget the smell of the earth
And do not serve it well
What use are my hands
Why am I living in the world

How can I believe the foolish idea
That my language is weak and poor
If my mother's last words
Were in Evenk
